Why are our cities built for 6ft-tall men? The female architects who fought back

When Le Corbusier developed his proportional system Le Modulor in the 1940s, the great architect had in mind a handsome British policeman. His system 1._____ the entire postwar world, dictating everything from the height of a door handle to the scale of a staircase, all governed by the need to make everything as convenient as possible for this 6ft-tall ideal man. Its influence 2. _____ extended to the size of city blocks, 3._____ these responded to the size and needs of the car our imaginary hero drove to work. The Swiss-born, Paris-4 (RESERVA)._____ architect had originally proposed 1.75m, based 5._____ the average height of a Frenchman, but it later grew. “In English detective novels,” said Le Corbusier, explaining his change of mind, “the good-looking men, such as policemen, are always 6ft tall!” This modernist worldview 6._____ to account for women, 7._____ children, elderly and disabled people – 8._____, in fact, who fell outside the statuesque ideal.

By the 1980s, some women 9._____ enough. After decades of struggling with prams and shopping trolleys, navigating dark underpasses, blind alleyways and labyrinthine subways in the urban obstacle course mostly made by men, it was high time a different approach 10._____. The Matrix Feminist Design Co-operative 11._____ their manifesto in 1981, stating that “women have a different perspective of their environment from the men who created it. Because there is no ‘women’s tradition’ in building design, we want to explore the new possibilities that the recent change in women’s lives and 12._____ have opened up.”

Forty years later, the surviving members of Matrix 13._____ a corner of the Barbican with an exhibition called “How We Live Now”. It begins with a short film that documented women’s experiences of navigating Paradise Circus, part of the postwar city centre conceived as an island in a gyratory 14 (RESERVA)._____, hemmed by a ring road and accessed by subways, steps and high-level walkways. Not only 15._____ an inability on the part of male architects to envisage what women actually do and need in their buildings”, but also the invisibility of women when it 16._____ urban design.

Another case in point is the Essex Women’s Refuge. The complex, designed by a male architect, had got basic things wrong, from the shared kitchen, which was 17 (RESERVA)._____ small, to the location of the children’s play areas, which were completely separate from the main communal areas, with no visual or aural connection for passive supervision.

As Matrix write: “Consciously or 18._____, designers work in accordance with a set of ideas about 19._____, who or what is valued, who does 20._____ and who goes where.” The question is who gets included, whose values we prioritise, and what kind of world we want to create.
